our thoughts

I am pleased to present to you The Women’s Center 2014 Annual Report. Once again, domestic and sexual violence made national and local headlines. We witnessed prominent sports figures engaging in intimate partner violence, a beloved actor who once portrayed a kindly preacher confessed that he perpetrated child sexual assault, and a respected comedian faced multiple accusations of sexual violence...to name just a few.

And once again because of those high profile cases the discourse on domestic and sexual violence rose from a murmur to a roar.

We see domestic and sexual violence occurring in our own communities each and every day. It can be disheartening when our larger society seems to only show a keen interest when either the victim or perpetrator is a celebrity. Our hearts break for the loss of innocence, safety and security that victims suffer each and every day. And each time one of our heroes turns out to be a monster we might be tempted to say that the problem is too big for us to ever hope to eradicate.

It’s important to focus on the victories that the heightened awareness brings. For the first time in history one of the most watched sporting events in the nation featured an ad about domestic violence. One of the most powerful sports organizations in the nation is now actively and openly supporting victim advocacy. The Obama Administration released a series of steps that universities and colleges must take in order to prevent sexual violence on campus. In Pennsylvania, the Sexual Violence Victim Protection Act became the law of the land.

Look at the things we’ve accomplished. Together we can end domestic and sexual violence. Together we can stand and declare NO MORE. And together we will.
